PRACTICE AREAS

- Elder Law and Estate Planning
- Guardianships

> Jeremy Gottlieb focuses on Article 81 guardianship proceedings and estate litigation. He brings two perspectives to that work: experience in the chambers of a Kings County judge and 15 years in investigations and management.

For a family considering guardianship, the first question is often a very personal one. A parent may still make decisions about where to live and whom to see, even as paying bills or managing a bank account becomes difficult. Jeremy's work as an Associate on Abrams Fensterman's Elder Law, Estate Planning & Administration team centers on matters where those distinctions have real consequences for an individual and the people closest to them.

Experience in the courtroom and in private practice

Before joining Abrams Fensterman, Jeremy served as an Assistant Law Clerk to the Honorable Dweynie E. Paul in Kings County Supreme Court. In chambers, he worked on guardianship proceedings and civil litigation. In private practice at a New York City law firm, he gained experience in trusts, estates, and guardianship law. Together, those roles gave him a view of the same kinds of questions from two vantage points: how a family's concerns take shape as a legal matter and how that matter comes before a court.

In an Article 81 guardianship proceeding, the court considers the individual's circumstances and identifies specific decisions for which assistance may be needed. Relevant considerations include the support the individual receives day to day, the decisions the individual wishes to continue making independently, and any arrangements already in place. Jeremy draws on his experience in Kings County Supreme Court to help families understand how these considerations relate to their own circumstances.

Jeremy's earlier career included domestic and international due diligence. The habits that work demands have particular value in an estate dispute. Family members may remember the same conversation differently. An account statement, a letter, or the date a document was signed may clarify the sequence of events. Knowing which facts can be established, and which questions remain open, gives counsel and clients a sounder basis for deciding how to proceed.

Jeremy works with Partner Moriah Adamo, who leads the practice from the firm's Lake Success office. His focus on guardianship and contested estates complements the team's planning and administration work. For a family whose circumstances change over time, that connection matters. A conversation that begins with planning for a parent's future may later call for an attorney who understands how those arrangements will be examined in court.

Jeremy is a dedicated advocate for the queer community. Outside the office, he volunteers with the Queens County Bar Association's LGBTQIA+ Committee and plays in local recreational sports leagues.
